THOUSANDS WALK AFTER BLOCKADE OF BRIDGE TRAINS

Crowds, Unloaded in Brooklyn Station, Are Jammed in One Narrow Exit.

see and thousands more got snarled up in a human blockade this morning in a twenty minute tie-up on Brooklyn

At the height of the Manhattanward rush a Bay Ridge train of the B. R. T. went dead just as the forward pared the first tower out from the Brooklyn side. The motor collapsed without any warning—and without any reason either so far as anybody could find out.

At any rate the train came to a dead by one until thirty of them carrying an average of 500 passengers each, were stretched along the "L" tracks for a Drop Crowds in Brooklyn. While a volunteer wrecking gang nade up of train crews labored to fan he spark of life and motion back into the deceased motor the blockade grew like magic. The best the P. R. T. could do was to slowly switch trains into a siding at the Brooklyn terminal and discharge the cargoes there, so that the travellers might have the op tion of crossing afoot or trying to board the already packed trolley cars on the surface lines below.

This attempt to relieve the situation led to even worse complications. For an it happened the only means of egress from the upper station level was by means of a single gate guarded with a turnstile and thence by narrow stair-ways to the lower floor.

Presently there was a jam there that the policemen on duty and the platform guards could not begin to handle. Thousands of men and women, boys and girls-and a few bables-were wedge together in a comparatively narrow *pace.

A thin human stream trickled through the clicking turnstile, but for every one who escaped there were ten fres recruits from behind. Straw hats were smashed, umbrellas suffered serious fractures of the ribs, and there was hardly one in all the press who didn't limp afterward from the pressure of strange feet upon tender toes.

Women Faint Standing Up. There were few audible complaints, because that sort of thing is all in the day's work for a Brooklynite. But a few young women took advantage of the opportunity to faint standing up. There wasn't room to fall down and do it

Capt. Bourke of the Bridge Squad, got all the reserves from sub-station A and by dint of hard work the policemen finally made some sort of order and pre-served it until the original cause of the trouble was removed and the trains began to slide over to New York.
